The protection of privacy in the workplace: a comparative study

This study investigated privacy protection in the workplace in the light of advancements in technology. The candidate first traced the historical development of privacy protection, analysed modern conceptions of privacy and constructed a representative definition of privacy. This was followed by identification and analysis of employer practices that pose a fundamental challenge to privacy in the workplace, with special emphasis on e-mail and internet use as well as genetic testing. Finally, the candidate makes suggestions for a sound balance between employees' privacy interests and employers' managerial prerogative. It is submitted that the study makes a substantial contribution to our understanding of privacy in the employment context.

Acquisitive prescription in view of the property clause

Die kandidaat analiseer die grondwetlikheid van verkrygende verjaring, 'n oorspronklike wyse van eiendomsverkryging, volgens die FNB-metodologie. Vir hierdie doel word die vereistes vir verjaring in die Suid-Afrikaanse reg ondersoek en vergelyk met dié van die Engelse, Nederlandse, Franse en Duitse reg. Vervolgens word die regverdigingsgronde vir verjaring in die Lockeaanse arbeidsteorie, Radin se persoonlikheidsteorie, utilitarisme en law and economics-teorie onder die loep geneem. Die gevolgtrekkings toon dat verjaring 'n grondwetlik geldige, nie-arbitrêre ontneming van eiendom in terme van artikel 25(1) behels en dat dit nie kan neerkom op onteiening sonder vergoeding of konstruktiewe onteiening nie.

The impact of section 26 of the Constitution on the eviction of squatters in South African law

The candidate argues that the housing rights in section 26 of the Constitution have had a profound impact on South African evictions law. Key developments are the joinder of local authorities to eviction proceedings, the requirement of meaningful engagement with unlawful occupiers, and alternative accommodation as a weighty consideration in the evaluation of the justice and equity of an eviction order. The adjudication of eviction disputes in the post-apartheid era requires context-sensitive adjudication aimed at achieving case-specific solutions which are sensitive to the political, social and economic context of homelessness in South Africa.

The justification and limits of affirmative action: a jurisprudential and legal critique

This dissertation rethinks the justifications and limits of affirmative action in view of current debates. Conceptual and theoretical tools such as compensatory and distributive theories of justice are analysed and juxtaposed to each other, as are substantive and remedial conceptions of constitutional equality and recognition-based and redistributive notions of politics as well as comparative international examples. It is ultimately asked whether a re-crafted affirmative action policy would not be better able to reach the intended goals of redress and equality. It is argued that various negative consequences of affirmative action could be better addressed if the specific beneficiaries of affirmative action were to be rethought along the lines suggested in the dissertation.

A scorecard for monitoring and evaluation of governance of special schools in the Western Cape

The cause of poor school performance and learner outcomes is often a direct result of poor school governance. Studies identified a number of factors affecting the standard of school governance, of which one is absence of an effective monitoring and evaluation system. The candidate has designed a measurement instrument in the form of a balanced scorecard to address this particular gap. A number of school governance performance areas based on regulatory frameworks have been linked to specific indicators and measures. A learning and developmental approach in the form of a peer review format, using a clear and simple process, has been developed to apply this measurement system.

The functionality grid as paradigm for management of technology

Management of technology (MOT) is a new field of knowledge that focuses on technology-based innovation opportunities. These are the major sources of economic growth. As a new field MOT needs a paradigm – a concise conceptual foundation to provide a pattern for its development. Mr Lochner sensed that the functionality grid, a little known theoretical construct, could serve such a role. Through a diligent theoretical and empirical investigation he proved the validity of his expectation. His findings help structure MOT, encourage a uniform technological language and define MOT as a pivotal profession for the 21st century.

Establishing viable and sustainable rural economic development programmes in a competitive global economy

Rural poverty seems to get worse despite escalating expenditures on rural development. The problem is that rural development is regarded as a welfare function rather than an economic opportunity. Based on a detailed critique of existing theories of rural development, a trans-disciplinary case study of the marula value chain is used to conceptualise an alternative theory of rural development. It is concluded that rural households engaged in marula cultivation could gain a much larger share of the value chain if they could access appropriate funding and institutional support. The result would be rural economic development that links global and local markets.

Critical success factors for public-private partnerships in South Africa

The Public-Private Partnership (PPP) is a popular, but often inappropriately applied alternative for public service delivery. There are numerous examples of PPPs not delivering as expected or totally collapsing. In this dissertation critical success factors for PPPs are identified through a meticulous process of analysing sources of sets of success factors, comparing these sets and combining them in a repetitive layered process of synthesis. This resulted in an instrument that enables the public service decision-maker to determine whether a PPP would be an appropriate service delivery vehicle, and how such a PPP will have a greater chance of successful implementation.

A model for the sustainability of local suppliers in the South African automotive value chain

The economic sustainability of local automotive suppliers in emerging markets depends on the integration of these suppliers into the global automotive value chain. Respectively it can be stated that the factors on the micro, meso and macro levels are influencing the performance of those entities. This dissertation includes the development of a conceptual model with independent variables on the system levels as well as dependent variables for the measurement of economic sustainability. Besides the theoretical implications from the empirical primary research, practical implications are that economies of scale, deepening of the local industry and the country's infrastructure are of high importance.

Complexity and leadership: conceptual and competency implications

In this dissertation a meta-competency model for leadership in complex military systems is developed. The purpose of this model is to enable the individual as well as the system to develop adequate adaptive properties and nourish a state of autopoiesis, which is a fundamental network of processes that creates and renews itself in a dynamic way. The meta-competency model supports a state of autopoiesis by enabling a sustainable individual and institutional systemic balance between negative and positive feedback, leading to the facilitation of the system operating in the domain between linearly determined order and indeterminate chaos, the realm of complexity.
