Foreign capital flows and economic growth in selected sub-Saharan African economies

Sub-Saharan African (SSA) countries are characterised by high levels of poverty and low domestic capacity to save. Foreign capital is therefore required to supplement the wide gap between domestic savings and domestic investment to achieve sustainable economic growth. This dissertation explored the relative contribution of the various foreign capital flows to economic growth in selected SSA countries using the Johansen Co-integration technique. The study found that the heterogeneity of countries are important in the type of foreign capital that contributes positively and significantly to economic growth with remittances and foreign direct investment contributing relatively more than foreign aid, foreign debts and portfolio equity.

Essays on exchange rate behaviour and macroeconomic performance in Ghana

Exchange rate behaviour is examined to ascertain its impact on key macroeconomic variables in Ghana using the Johansen Co-integration and vector error correction modelling and Auto Regressive Distributed Lag techniques. Evidence points to episodes of significant misalignment with undervaluation first and then overvaluation, high pass-through during episodes of large depreciation and a negative effect of depreciation on the trade balance. The evidence suggests a poorly managed exchange rate policy over the periods of the study. The study further suggests that exchange rate policy alone is not enough to improve trade performance and economic growth. Improving the structure and conditions of the productive sector are critical to improving competitiveness of Ghana's exports, reducing the import bill and accumulating foreign reserves. Lastly, a properly managed float exchange rate system will contribute to a successful inflation targeting policy and ensure macroeconomic stability.

Financing structure and financial sustainability of microfinance institutions (MFIs): evidence from selected SADC MFIs

The candidate's dissertation examined the relationship between the financing structure and financial sustainability for selected SADC MFIs as part of the paradigm shift to commercialisation in the microfinance industry. The need to structure financing methodologies capable of proffering continuity of MFIs' operations while advancing outreach and impact in the poverty-stricken region informed the study. The results show that regulatory costs and underdeveloped capital markets limit the use of debt and deposits by MFIs. Embracing cost efficiency, reduction in portfolio at risk, use of cheap financing sources and promotion of efficient markets increase MFIs' chances of financial sustainability.

Innovation and access to finance in African enterprises

This study established a link between finance and innovation amongst firms in five African countries. Overall there are three channels through which finance drives innovation: asset finance, trade credit and overdraft. Overdraft stands out as the most significant and consistent channel through which finance enhances firm product and process innovation in all five countries, signifying that overdraft facility is a key channel through which finance drives innovation in African firms. Financial sector development policies that enhance increased firm access to bank credit at lower costs have positive consequences for firm innovation. Innovation hubs must also include financial institutions as partners.

Financial development, financial inclusion and welfare dynamics in sub-Saharan Africa

The study uses different advanced econometric techniques such as the augmented mean group estimator, cross-sectional and quantile regression techniques to investigate the relationship between financial development, financial inclusion and welfare dynamics in sub-Saharan Africa. The results revealed that financial development has a non-linear relationship with income inequality ranging from u-shape to inverted u-shape in the group of African countries studied. Furthermore, some aspects of financial inclusion exert a positive influence on welfare with the exception of income inequality as measured by the Gini coefficient. Policy reforms in sub-Saharan Africa should focus on addressing market imperfections and encourage wider quality financial access for the poor to enable them to build assets.

Foreign direct investment and welfare dynamics in Africa

This research examined the dynamics of how foreign direct investment (FDI) translates into social welfare functions in selected African countries. FDI exhibits a non-linear impact on multidimensional welfare, with initial increases in welfare eroded after a turning point. In terms of one-dimensional welfare, however, FDI has a negative but transitory effect on human capital development and FDI is ultimately welfare-enhancing exclusively via health outcomes. The extent to which international business activities translate into welfare gains is intrinsically linked to underlying investment policies. Such policies must have clearly spelt out welfare components, for instance health for international business to be welfare-enhancing.

An investigation of potential interrelationships between the entrepreneur's coping values and the development of stages of a business Development of early-stage entrepreneurial ventures to high-growth businesses is complex. Relatively few entrepreneurs are successful in achieving this. This research explores potential interrelationships between developmental stages of businesses and the coping values of entrepreneurs. The results indicate a dynamic interrelationship between clusters of entrepreneurial values and business development stages. The research makes a significant contribution to an understanding of the complex interrelationship between entrepreneurial values and business manifestations thereof. Academically it is an important contribution to the body of knowledge on entrepreneurship.

From an ecosystem perspective it provides business developers with pointers to embed in entrepreneurship development programmes.

Drivers of organisational performance: a state-owned enterprise perspective

This study analysed factors that drive state-owned enterprises (SOEs) performance in selected African countries. It shows that inadequate resources, diverse stakeholder needs and massive political pressures negatively impact on SOE performance. SOE performance can be enhanced through a policy with the following framework: Well-defined state shareholder rights which are governed by signed-off agreements; A limited state involvement in SOE restricted to matters of policy; An SOE governance structure which recognises representatives from various stakeholders based on merit as the primary consideration for constituting SOE boards.

Enhancing small business competitiveness in Nigeria through public-private partnerships in cluster development

The candidate, a Nigerian banker, has focused on Nigeria's small businesses, which have played a critical role in the country's job creation and economic development process. His study views the evolution of small-business clusters as central to small-business growth. Based on cluster strategy reviews of countries across the world (including South Africa) and more detailed analysis of Nigeria's clustering experience, the research extracts key elements for a cluster development strategy for Nigeria. This leads to a range of recommendations for an active public-private partnership approach for cluster development in Nigeria, with lessons relevant for other parts of Africa.

New service development strategy and process: Considering concepts from the financial sector in an analysis of the hospitality sector in Kenya

Significant differences exist between service sectors based on their underlying technologies, differentiated skills, complementary assets, routines of new service development (NSD), amount of competition, and bargaining power of clients. The candidate used an exploratory research design to investigate the NSD strategy and process in the hospitality sector and developed a new service development conceptual framework for the hospitality sector in Kenya. The results also revealed fundamental differences between various service sectors and indicated that existing NSD models need to be adapted based on the uniqueness of each sector.
