Public and Development Management

2024

Public and Development Management Overview

Public and Development Management (PDM), with its triple focus on Public Management, Public Policy Analysis and Development Management, is offered as a major or ancillary subject in a variety of degrees within Stellenbosch University.

Undergraduate studies in BA or BCom Public and Development Management aim to equip students with professional knowledge about the required techniques and skills to join the public sector, non-governmental sector or the development sector.

The course also includes a strong focus on civic life and the rights and duties of citizens and helps students develop their own independent judgment in making political and administrative choices.

Like many other developing countries, South Africa faces complex developmental and public policy challenges. These demand collaborative action by the public, business and voluntary sectors, along with broader civil society at local, provincial, national and global levels.

These complexities include social, economic, environmental developmental and public policy challenges; for example, poverty, unemployment, inequality, the climate emergency, and the perils and possibilities associated with the Fourth Industrial Revolution.

Public and Development Management provides exposure and insight into these challenges, specifically in southern developing countries. It helps future practitioners develop embodied policy responses and manage such responses effectively, efficiently and equitably.
